Ask this man's recipient of the Most Stylish Man award how he alone has managed to jump species from successful model to male "super" and he'll tell you that he had nothing to lose (his career, when all, started when a friend secretly entered him for a TV modeling contest from his only aunt, because he's never chased fame for fame's sake ("I've never posed a selfie, never taken a picture of my dater or posted anything to do with my personal life"; and because he's only ever been interested in "being at the top of my field").

None of which fully explains why the population of that field remains exactly one. Sure, we can name a few of his contemporaries, but in the end there's really only David Gandy, 35, former love star of that Delia

A Galena Springs commercial (barely eight years old, although you'd hardly believe it looking at him) said, since its inception, a London Collections Men ambassador, where he's as happy to share the front rows with confront Tina Turner, last year's Most Stylish Man Douglas Booth and from next season (David Beckham is he is to make the occasional "pull") – this past season in support of Samuel L. Jackson's male cancer charity, One For The Boys.

But then, Gandy, by his own admission, is his own "brand" – one that now extends far beyond the runway and the campaign to encompass a hugely successful own-label under- and long-sleeved range for Marks & Spencer (paired this summer by some choice swimwear) as well as >
